THE HISTORY OF COFFEE

The coffee plant was first discovered in Ethiopia and found its way to Arabia sometime around the 7th century. Originally the Ethiopians would chew raw coffee beans as they realised the beans had a stimulating effect. They would also pound raw coffee beans and mix them with animal fat to make a powerful cocktail of fat, protein and caffeine, which gave them a concentrated source of energy. This was one of the first power foods and was easily transportable.

By the 16th century coffee was being drunk in the home and the Turks had mastered the art of brewing coffee. They would roast the beans on stone trays, then pulverise the beans with sugar and spices such as cardamom, cloves and cinnamon to make a rich flavoursome drink.

Turkish coffee was made by combining equal quantities of finely ground coffee and sugar, adding water and then boiling in a small pan known as an Ibrik. As the coffee boils up the pan it is removed from the heat and the contents allowed to settle. It is then returned to the heat and the process is repeated several times. It is a lengthy process and needs the sugar to round off the flavour from the constant heating. A thick sediment is left to settle at the bottom of the drink. This method is still used today.

Italy was the first country in Europe to import coffee on a commercial basis.

As demand grew so did the desire for more innovative methods of coffee brewing. In 1948 Achille Gaggia, an inventor from Milan, designed the first espresso machine. Whilst the original models were feared for their temperamental nature, it was thought the resulting espresso was worth the effort. These machines were also unique in their ability to produce steam, which enabled milk to be frothed to transform the espresso into the classic cappuccino so named because its colour was reminiscent of the pale robes of the Capuchin monks. These machines also had the advantage of being able to produce the coffee much more quickly, hence the term espresso.

There are now over 400 billion cups of coffee drunk worldwide every year.
